The Clay is to be got from the banks of the river, the Limestone from the Limestone Islands, &c. which surround the Bay: there is an inexhaustible supply of both of these materials, which are of very good quality and very similar in their chemical constituents to the clays and limestones used in the best cement works in England, i.e. the Portland, Medway, and Thames Coment Companies. The Coal required is also close at hand and after careful examination I find the Coal of the District eminently adapted to the burning of Cament. The existing Machinery will have to be removed but it can be used for the manufacture of Bricks, and New Kilns, Engines, and Machinery will have to be erected, also a Pier of about 100 feet long to allow Steam-launches to discharge easily. I calculate the cost of existing buildings and materials at the site at $12,000, but details of tests' I am now making and the cost of erection of New Machinery I will forward you in a day by two. As to the articles enumerated by the witness as being in the place at the time of the fire, Mr. WODEHOUSE seems to have been of opinion that a number of them had never been existent at all. It was certainly rather surprising to tions, Ladies, Children, and Infants, and for regular use in Warm Climates. Although the connection between overinsurance and the occurrence of the fire, was not established in the present case, or was even negatived, the remarks of Mr. Wode-House on the principles of insurance are none the less to the point, read in a general easily become antagonistic; and he expresses for improper practices in Hongkong have policies are granted recklessly, and considering the reluctance which always exists to only the interests of the insured and insurers were involved, the parties might be left to settle matters between themselves as in other transactions; but seeing that SOAP the outbreak of fire endangers not only the bouse in which it occurs, but also surrounding property, as well as human life, every possible effort should be made to put a stop to improper practices, the object being, not regard for the interests of insurance companies, but the protection of the public. The Fire Inquiry Ordinance has undoubtedly been useful in this direction. As Mr. Workhouse says, it has had the effect of emphasizing and bringing into relief suspicious circumstances which otherwise. Guaranteed to be absolutely pure, and may be without the machinery which forms the inquiry, might remain undiscovered and be merely suspected, and the publicity of these inquiries and the restraint imposed on the parties from the knowledge that they will great benefit; but, he adds, "the real remedy for diminishing the number of fires not caused by accident is not the holding of these inquiries after the fire has occurred, cautiously and properly, and not with that recklessness which has been abown in some

The agencies were placed under the charge of skilled workmen specially imported from the Canton, Foschow, and Hankow tea gardens. Owing to the new processes introduced by them the quality of Puerh tea has greatly improved, a marked impetus has been given to its sale, and a very fair revenue is being realized for the provincial exchequer. The Puerh tea, as sold in Bhame, is of coarse appearance, but it possesses a very fine aroma and it can be drunk all day long with impunity. A ourious error has been circulated on good authority regarding Puerh tea, namely, that it is a medicinal tea drunk only on account of its aperient properties. "THE DEEMSTER," "A BON OF HAGAR THE SHADOW OF A CRIME," | Now First Published.] CHAPTER XX.

THE PEACE OATH. There was short shrift for Red Jason. was tried by the court nearest the spot, and that was the criminal court over which the Bishop in his civil capacity presided, with nine of his neighbours on the bench beside him. From this court an appeal was possible to the Court of the Quarter, and again from the Quarter Court to the High Court of Althing; but appeal in this case there was none, for there was no defence. And because Icelandic law did not allow of the imprisonment of a criminal until after he had been sentenced, an inquest was called forthwith. lest Jason should escape or compass the crime he had attempted. So the Court of Inquiry sat the same night in the wooden shed that served both for Senate and House of Justice. The snow was now falling heavily, and the hour was late, but the court-house was thronged: It was a little place—a plain box bare. featureless, and chill, with walls, roof, and seats of wood, and floor of hard earth. Four short benches were raised, step above step. cosinst—the-farthest-side—and—on—the—highest of these the Bishop sat, with three of his collearnes on each of the three rows beneath him. The prisoner stood on a broad stool to the right and the witnesses on a like stool to the left. A wooden bar crossed the room about midway, and in the open space between that and the door the rafters by hemp ropes tied about their middle. was full of the vapour of the snow that was melting on the people's clothes. Nothing could be ruder than the court-house, but the Court that sat there observed a rule of procedure that was almost an idolatry of form.

The prisoner was called by the name of Jason. son of Stephon Orry, and having answered in a voice so hollow that it seemed to come out the earth beneath him, he rose to his place. Hi attitude was dull and impassive, and he seemed hardly to see the restlest crowd that murmured at sight of him. His tall figure stooped, there was a cloud on his strong brow, and a slow fire in his blood-shot eyes, and his red hair, long as a woman's, hung in disordered masses down his worn cheeks to his shoulders. The Bishop, a venerable prelate of great age, looked at him and thought, "That man's heart is dead within

The mouthpiece of the Court was a middle aged man, who was short, had little piercing eyes square brush of iron grey hair that stood erect across the top of his corded forehead, and a crisp, clear utterance, like the crackle of a horse's hoofs on the frost.

Jason was charged with an attempt to take the life of Michael Sunlocks, first President of the second Republic. He did not plead and had no defence, and the witnesses against him spoke only in answer to the leading questions of the

The first of the witnesses was Greeba herself, and her evidence given in English, was interpreted by an interpreter. All her brave strength was now gone. She trembled visibly. Her eyes were down, her bead was bent, her face was half-hidden by the hood of a cloak she wore, and her tones were barely audible. She had little to say. The prisoner had forced his way into Government House, and there, to her own face, had threatened to take the life of her husband Th plain words he had done so, and then made show of going in pursuit of her husband tha he might carry out his design.

- "Wait," said the Bishop, "your husband was not present?" No. Said Greebs

"There was, therefore no direct violence?" 'And the whole sum of the prisoner's offence so far as von-know of it, lies in the use of the words that you have repeated ?"

Then, turning to the spokesman of the comthe old Bishop said-"There has been no overteact. This is no an attempt, but a threat to take life." "Your pardon, my lord," said the little man. in his crisp tones. "I will show that the prisoner is guilty of the essential part of murder itself. Murder my lord," he added, "is not merely to compass the destruction of a life, for there is homicids by misadventure. there is jus tifiable homicide, and there are the rights, long recognised by Icelandic law, of the avengers of blood. Murder is to kill in secreey and after long-harboured malice, and now, my lord, I shall show that the prisoner has lain in wait to slay the President of the Republic." At that Greebs stood down, and other witnesses followed her. Nearly everyone had been summoned with whom Jason had exchanged words since he landed eight days before. There was the lean student who had told him of the drill at the Latin school, the little tailor who had explained the work at the jail, the stuttering doorkeeper at the senate-house, and one of the masons at the fort. Much was made of the fainting in the Cathedral yard on the Sunday morning. and out of the deaf landlady, the Cathedral caretaker, some startling disclosures seemed to be

"Still." said the old Bishop. "I see no over "Good gracious, my lord," said the little spokasman, "are we to wait until the knife itself has been reddened ?" "God forbid," said the old Bishop.

Then came two witnesses to prove motive The first of them was the tipsy comrade of former days, who had drawn Jason into the drinking-shop. He could say of his own know ledge that Jason was jealons of the new gover nor. The two were brothers in a sort of way, So people said, and so Jason had told him. They had the same father, but different mothers. Jason's mother had been the daughter of the old governor, who turned his back on her at her marriage. At her death he relented, and tried to find Jeson, but could not, and then took up with Michael Sunlocks. People said that was the beginning of the new governor's fortune. At all events Jason thought he had been supplanted, was very wroth, and swore he would be revenged. The second of the two witnesses pointed to a very different motive. He was one of the three Danes, who had twice spoken to Jason—the elderly man of the meek and oniet manner. Though himself loyal to the Icelandic Republic he had been much thrown among its enemies Jason was one of them: he came here as a spy direct from Copenhagen, and his constant associates were Thomsen, an old, white-headed man living in the High Street, and Polyesen, young and sallow man, who kept one of the stores facing the sea. With these two Jason had been heard by him to plan the assassination of

At this evidence there was a deep murmur among the people, and it was seen that Greeba and stormed within her. She tried to speak but history, and seized with a strong sympathy he could not. At the same moment Jason turned history nerve to keep back his and she handed over the duty to Oscar, who was his bloodshot eyes in her direction, and then her limbs gave way under her, and she sank back with a moan. The Court misread her emotion. and she was removed. Jason's red eyes followed safety of Sunlocks, he now fell back that the held communication of some sort with the man her constantly.

It was lawful to question the prisoner, and so to was questioned. "Is it true that you have been lying in wa to kill the President ?" asked the spokesman, But Jason made no answer.

Then an aged Lutheran priest, who had sat within the rail with a shuff-box in his hand and a red print handkerchief across his knee, hobbled up to the witness stool and tendered evidence. He could throw light on the prisoner's hatred of the President, if it was true that the President-was a son of Stephen Orry. He knew the prisoner, and had named him in his baptism. He had known the prisoner's mother also, and had sat with her at her death. It was quite true that she was a daughter of the late

Governor, and had been badly treated by her father. But she had been yet more badly treated by her husband, who married again while she was still alive, and had another son by the other lief, and at the next instant she reprosched herwife. And there was other whispering, and much nodding of heads

Encouraged by these comments the little spokesman added--"In any other country at this age of the world a man who tacitly admitted a design to take life she spoke, lest in the fervour of her plea the the world would be promptly clapped into prison." "Ay, ay," the people muttered, but the Bishop draw himself up and said. "In any other country a criminal who showed no fear of the death that hung over him would be straightway consigned to a madhouse." "We have no madhouse in this island, my lord." said the little spokesman, "saye the Sulphur Mines, and there he must go." "Wait," said the Bishop." and once again he turned to the prisoner. "If this Court should agree to ship you out of Iceland will you promise never more to return to it?"

Jason, but he did not seem to hear the Bishop's question. "Will you promise ?" said the Bishop again.

For the third time all eyes were turned on

"No." said Jason. "Dangerous trifling," said the spokesman. When you seize a mad dog you strangle it." "Ay, sy." cried many voices at once, and great exciten at prevailed.

The old Bishop drew back with a sigh of relief. He lovel Michael Sunlocks and had So thinking, and orying a little, like a true her husband. But from the moment he saw her purpose into effect. Meantime she contrived Jason and thought, "That man's heart is dead to send him jellies and soups, such as might within him," his love had struggled with his tempt the appetite of a sick man. "Gracious heavens, my lord," cried the little you refuse to take the Oath of Peace pledging yourself for ever, as long as you live or the world endures to be at one with your enemy as brothers before all-men living." Now Greebs alone knew the truth about Jason. When she had fled from Man without word or warning it had not been out of fear of him, but of her brothers. Her meeting with Michael Sunlocks her short stay with the good old Bishop Petersen, her marriage and the festival that followed, had passed her by like a dream. Then came the first short parting with Suplooks when he had said. "I must leave you for a fortnight, for the men I sent in search of your father have blundered and returned without him." She had cried a little at that, and he had kissed here and made a brave show of his courage, though alle could see the tears in his own hig chining relieve the heat of his brain, and on the table by eyes. But it was all a dream, a awest and happydream, and only by the coming of Jason had the dream been broken. Then followed her terror, her plea her fear for her husband's life, her dellarge of Jason, and the charge she made against him. And the first burst of her passion over, she "Jason," she said, "I am sahamed. It is

"He is likely," thought Greebs, and straight way she conceived of a plan. She would go to Jason in his prison. Yes, she berself would go to him, and prevail with him to put away all thoughts of vengeance and be at peace with her husband. Then she would wait for the return of Michael Sunlocks, and plead with that dear heart that could dony her nothing, to grant her Jason's pardon.
